Ischemia following transient cerebral ischemia is known to cause a secondary degeneration in the penumbral regions. Many groups have attempted to suppress this second injury by pharmacological or surgical methods. An important experimental model is transient middle cerebral artery occlusion (MCAO) in rats. This research project focuses on two serious long-term disorders of cerebral circulation: 1) clinical subarachnoid hemorrhage (SAH) and 2) post-traumatic cerebral vasospasm (PCVS). Both of these clinical diseases are associated with delayed cerebral ischemia and morbidity. The rat is a highly favored model for many aspects of human brain injury and SAH due to its similarity in anatomy and vasculature. Other advantages of this model include the ease of pharmacological and surgical manipulations. For this study, we propose two aims. 1) We will use a rat model of SAH to test the hypothesis that the heparin-containing hemodilution and cerebral vasodilation occur in cerebral ischemia and reperfusion. Specific objectives will be to: 1) test the ability to pharmacologically and/or surgically reduce early vasospasm in the SAH model; 2) determine if the neuroprotective efficacy of hemodilution is time and dose-dependent; 3) examine the effect of heparin pretreatment on the development of early cerebral ischemia and reperfusion injury; and 4) investigate the effect of heparin on the development of vasospasm. 2) We will use a rat model of PCVS to test the hypothesis
